talks only of a significant strategic superiority. He does not address himself to whether the US possesses would have enough or whether the USSR would build them after it had what it considered a sufficient number. It is nonsense to believe that if they planned a regular 100 they would build 300, as it is to say that if the US had 100 & that was enough, it should build more just because it could. And talk of missle gap is foolish except in terms of need.
